The title of the exhibition Jazira refers to the word “island” in Arabic, which according to historians gave its name to the city because of a group of islands off the coast of Algiers (El-Djezair), and by extension to all of Algeria. Throughout history the territory of Algiers expanded onto the sea, and gradually the islands became connected to the city. The land appropriated the sea in the same way that it appropriated the cultures and civilizations that came into contact with it. Over the course of centuries, Algeria was nourished by Phoenician, Roman, Berber, Arab, Ottoman, Jewish, Spanish, French tales… The religious and social syncretism deriving from these cross-fertilizations make up the background of Algerian society.

El Meya inherited this diversity. She borrows traditional scenes from the collective imagination and the history of the country, which she transposes into her paintings. The subject matter, the objects, the backgrounds she juxtaposes on her canvases follow a precise codification, as do rituals (scenes of sacrifice and trance, rites of passage…). She stages men and women executing specific gestures that are sometimes simple to understand, and sometimes in need of deciphering. Like in a puppet show, bodies appear strangely divided up. Each face, each limb, seems to have been assigned a specific function. The grotesque stands alongside the tragic, delicacy alongside cruelty.

The creative context of El Meya’s work is informed by tastes inherited from trends running through art history up until today: modern art, but also Islamic art and Persian influences.

The works exhibited show a particular interest in orientalist representations depicting how the colonial gaze fantasizes local populations. El Meya extracts singular images of people, places and images which supposedly represent typical Algerian men and women. Through my paintings I try to talk about present day Algeria from my subjective viewpoint as an Algerian painter, who neither wants to reestablish the old orientalist vision nor wants to deconstruct knowledge inherited from the past, but strives rather to create new images, those of a new perspective reinstating the complexity and diversity of histories, places, and facts.
